The fashion industry is feeling increasing pressure from customers to disclose its impact on climate change. More than 120 fashion brands have therefore signed the UN Climate Charter for the Fashion Industry. It demonstrates the industry's intention to contribute to the UN Paris Agreement commitment to limit global warming to 1.5°C. To achieve this goal, the fashion industry has set a target to reduce carbon emissions by 30% by 2030. Another major business risk is the lack of access to clean and sufficient water. The fashion industry recognises that the scale of this challenge requires it to take action to meet its own commitments and market demands for greater sustainability. Reports by the Carbon Disclosure Project (CDP) highlight that the fashion industry is under-monitoring and under-reporting its impacts on emissions and water scarcity compared to other sectors.

These trends increase the pressure on all stakeholders in the textile value chain to measure, understand, report and improve their impact on climate change. This presentation will introduce the requirements for sustainable textile production and the method for reporting the carbon and water footprint of textile and apparel companies.

Pillars of sustainable fashion

A sexy sticker that attracts the eyes of a customer, creates a joyful peace of mind from the purchase, and also helps increase the price and margins of the manufacturer and the merchant. But is all that green-highlighted, eye-striking sustainability really sustainable?
